

Dear Sir,

I was a member of the BDAQ after completing my Diploma at Tafe. I have decided to go back to University to study a B.Arch to become an "Architect". After working for Architects and then going and becoming involved with building designers, the quality of there professionalism, skills and attitude was quite low to that of the Architect.

Now as a student studying long hours to become a 'professional' it is very annoying and depressing with what is happening to the profession that I am striving to become. Personally, I think the building designers should do the 'hard yards', all six years of them to get the status they want.

If your department wants any further imput from a students point of view please get in contact with me at my email address.

Thankx

Adam Beck

15 June 2000 – received by email